Self-Discipline

As we continue our discussion of discipline we come to self-discipline. The ultimate goal of instructive and corrective discipline is self-discipline. As children mature, they must learn how to make proper decisions. Their parents will not always be with them to guide them through life's choices. As independence increases, the need for self-discipline increases. Children who have received loving, consistent discipline from their parents all of their lives, will be better prepared to make the right decisions when their parents are not around.

Many dangers exist in today's world, threatening their lives, both physical and spiritual, of children. What makes the difference between "good kids," and "bad kids?" Self-discipline. Those kids who get into trouble with the law, or get hooked on drugs, or face pregnancies outside of marriage, or get into any kind of trouble do so because they make wrong choices. Parents ought to be keenly aware of their role in helping their children stay away from these kinds of troubles. They cannot make decisions for the children all of their lives. The older children get, the more choices they will face on their own. if parents can instill a godly self-discipline in their children, then their children will be much more likely to stay away from the terrible dangers that plague so many of today's young people. Remember the words of the proverb: "Train up a child in the way he should god: and when he is old, he will not depart from it" (Proverbs 22:6).

For His Glory—Elvis Galbreath
