Respect in the Family

Lack of respect is seen in the family when family members do not treat one another with the dignity they deserve. Parents show the ultimate lack of respect for their children by abusing them, either physically or verbally. The following incident truly happened. During a worship service, a child, perhaps four or five years old, was crying during one of the prayers. The child's father, having failed to quiet the child, in a harsh voice said, "Shut up! Shut up, you crybaby!" Most people have probably witnessed similar demonstrations of disrespect that parents often show toward children. And some children often show no respect for their parents. They may ridicule their parents to their friends. They may argue with their parents and willfully violate their rules. God does not approve of these kinds of relationships within the home. There must be respect.

Webster defines respect as "high or special regard." In American culture, some attach more meaning to "respect" than is shown in Webster's definition. To some, respect for another person means not making moral judgments of others' actions. Thus, to "respect" the beliefs, or opinions, or actions of another means to tolerate them without passing judgment on the morality of those beliefs, or opinions, or actions.

Parents who love their children will naturally have a high respect for them. They will view each child as a gift from God: "Lo, children are an heritage of the LORD: and the fruit of the womb is his reward" (Ps. 127:3). With this understanding, parents see children as a great treasure to be cared for, not as a hindrance to their lifestyle.

For the children, respect for their parents comes from both love and discipline. Love produces appreciation and discipline produces admiration. When parents exercise appropriate discipline within the home, children can respect their parents. They come to know that their parents set boundaries for them and consistently demand adherence to those boundaries because of love. They come to know that their parents are fair and just in the way they run the household.

When parents and children alike realize that their actions influence the way people perceive their entire family, they will be more likely to stay away from shameful acts, if they have this respect for their family. Who knows how many children have said no to temptation mainly because they did not want to dishonor their parents and family? That kind of respect is healthy and contributes to the home as God would have it.
